High-dose methotrexate followed by intrathecal methotrexate for bi- or tri-resistant childhood acute lymphoblastic leukemia. Resistance to methotrexate (MTX) is commonly encountered in childhood acute lymphoblastic leukemia (ALL) and the high-dose MTX regimen has become the standard treatment for bi- or tri-resistant ALL. However, the efficacy of the protocol is often limited by the need for repeated courses of systemic MTX, or the toxic effects of the systemic and intrathecal MTX. We assessed the safety and efficacy of high-dose systemic MTX followed by intrathecal MTX in children with bi- or tri-resistant ALL. Seventeen patients with bi- or tri-resistant ALL were treated with three consecutive courses of high-dose MTX (5 g/m²) intravenously and 100 mg/m² intrathecally) combined with granulocyte-colony stimulating factor (G-CSF) support. The response rate was 73% (12/17) and the 10-month event-free survival and overall survival were 77.6 and 85.4%, respectively. Fifteen patients (88%) completed all three courses of treatment without any serious MTX-related adverse event and one patient was still alive at the last follow-up (8 years after associated with increased risk of vertebral fracture, impaired blood presence of neuromechanical alterations of the spine, which are also a consequence of the osteoporosis. Neuromechanical alterations of the spine of patients with early spinal osteoporosis were investigated by a goniometer and a myofascial loadmeter. To study the relative functional efficiency of the musculoskeletal system of patients with early spinal osteoporosis, the following functional parameters were evaluated: optimal work, passive bending, the force capacity of the back muscles when working, whole-body mobility, balance and the risk of fall. The biomechanical parameters as to muscle efficiency, muscle force and spinal balance were altered, but there was no clear tendency to risk of fall. The best
